The History of Detroit-Style Pizza

It was 1946, and Gus Guerra was looking for a way to squeeze a little more profit out of the bar he had bought on Conant in Detroit two years earlier. Selling food looked like the way to go. "Everybody else was doing fish and chips because the boys were coming back from the war, and that was very popular. But Dad didn't want to do what everybody else was doing. He thought he would try something a little different," said his son, Jack Guerra, at the family's current restaurant, Cloverleaf Bar & Restaurant in Eastpointe.

"So my grandmother - she was from Sicily - put together a recipe for dough, and she showed my dad how to make it," he said. Baked under toppings of cheese and tomato sauce, it was pizza - virtually unknown here at the time. The only other place making it, called Vesuvio's, did a round version. But at Gus' original place, Buddy's Rendezvous, they made it square, and that was the birth of what has become Detroit's signature pie: square, thick-crusted, topped first with a layer of cheese and then with restrained amounts of tomato sauce.

Today, square thick-crust pizzas remain a signature item in Detroit, and pizza aficionados still line up out the door for a fix of the thick, cheesy pies. Scores of other metro Detroit places make square pizzas, too. And while not all trace their roots directly to Gus Guerra's pies, there appears to be no real dispute that he began the Detroit-style pizza tradition.

Norm's Detroit-style pizza is descended from Gus' place, so try some and have a slice of how things were in the '40s in Detroit.
